Workforce Solutions M&A Review

Introduction

In this report, we look at the emerging trends and notable M&A transactions in the Workforce Solutions industry during the third and fourth quarters of 2023. The 2023 deal volumes, as expected, have fallen short of the previous year's 341 transactions.

Two main factors are contributing to the slump in transactions in 2023:

- The rising interest rate environment contributes to less-than-favourable conditions for M&A transactions.
- Diminished appetite for risk among investors, evident in not only the number of deals, but also in the valuations investors are willing to pay.

It is important to emphasize that the setback is largely due to macroeconomic headwinds, rather than specific issues with the Workforce Solutions industry itself.

This report presents a more detailed analysis of the M&A activity in the sector over the past six months.

Long-term prospects for M&A in the Workforce Solutions sector remain strong, though 2023 deal volumes have fallen short of the record set in 2022.

M&A Overview

Despite macroeconomic factors causing a cooling effect on the market's performance in 2023, with a decade-low drop in the number of transactions, we observed a modest uptick in transaction volumes during the fourth quarter. In total, we analysed 186 workforce solutions transactions over the past two quarters, 75 of which were included in this report. The fourth quarter saw 103 transactions in the sector, a marked increase compared to the third quarter's 83 transactions.

Targets from the non-specialist Commercial Staffing (40 transactions, 22%) and Professional Staffing (27 transactions, 15%) subsectors represented the highest proportion of overall transactions. Within the specialist subsectors, Healthcare and Industrial Staffing were most common, with 25 (13%) and 22 (12%) transactions, respectively.

Geographically, Europe exhibited the highest M&A activity, accounting for 79 (42%) of buyers and 82 (44%) of targets. North America followed closely, securing the second position with a share of 43% for buyers and 39% for targets. Targets from the Netherlands and the United Kingdom were the most sought-after in Europe, with 27 and 25 completed deals, respectively. The Asia-Pacific region represented 15% of buyers and 17% of targets. Over three-quarters of all reported transactions were domestic, where the buyer and target were headquartered in the same country, with 23% classified as cross-border.

Strategic buyers accounted for the vast majority (85%) of all M&A transactions in the period. The Strategic Buyer category includes buyers that are PE-backed, as well as listed businesses and other privately held companies.

As it is customary for private M&A transactions, most deal terms were not disclosed. For the very small sample of transactions with disclosed transaction metrics, the average deal size was $77.0m and the EBITDA multiple reported was 15.8x. Listed companies in the sector are currently trading at an average EV/EBITDA multiple of 7.2x.

The AI Revolution and Its Impact on the Future of Work

The AI Revolution is fundamentally transforming the workplace, presenting both opportunities and challenges for organisations and employees alike. As highlighted in recent reports by Adecco, Hays, and other leading workforce solutions firms, the integration of Generative AI (GenAI) technologies is a key driver of change in the 2024 workplace landscape.

GenAI, though in its infancy, is already a dominant trend, with around 70% of workers actively using these technologies. The optimism is high among workers, with a significant majority believing AI will positively impact their jobs, enhancing their skillsets and job prospects, especially in sectors like technology, finance, and e-commerce. This echoes the broader sentiment captured in Hays' analysis that AI skills will be crucial for career advancement.

However, this technological wave is not without its challenges. Adecco's research indicates a looming gap between workers who have access to advanced AI tools and training and those who don't, potentially exacerbating inequalities in the workforce. This disparity is highlighted by the fact that a greater proportion of executives and higher-income workers are using AI compared to their lower-income or less-educated counterparts. To address this, organizations need to prioritize equitable access to AI training and resources.

Another significant aspect of the AI impact is the shift in skill requirements. As AI takes over more technical tasks, soft skills like emotional intelligence, empathy, and active listening, which are less likely to be replicated by AI, are becoming increasingly valuable. This underscores the need for a balanced investment in both AI and human-centric skills to harness the full potential of the workforce.

In light of the AI Revolution's profound impact on the future of work, certain types of workforce solutions firms stand to benefit most. Firms with robust training and development capabilities will be particularly valuable, as they can help bridge the skills gap created by AI integration. These firms can offer targeted training programs in both AI technology and the vital soft skills that complement AI's capabilities, catering to the evolving needs of the workforce. Additionally, firms focusing on specific markets such as technology, finance, and e-commerce, where AI's influence is most pronounced, are likely to see increased demand. These sectors are rapidly adopting AI and require specialized skill sets that workforce solutions firms can provide. Consequently, we expect to see increased M&A activity in these areas in the next 3 to 4 years.

Contingent Workforce Demand in Times of Economic Uncertainty

In the second half of 2023, the contingent workforce market is showing stability in stark contrast to a more challenging permanent recruitment market. This has been noted in recent trading updates from Hays, PageGroup, and others. We expect this situation to continue whilst uncertainty remains in the wider market. As things start to improve, the contingent workforce market is anticipated to recuperate quicker than the permanent hiring sector. Past economic downturns and trends in workforce dynamics, particularly the balance between contingent and permanent hiring, offer insights into business strategies and market recovery. Historically, the trajectory of hiring post-recession follows a pattern influenced by economic stability, market demand, and shifts in workforce management approaches.

Post-Recession Reliance on Contingent Workforce

Initially, following a recession or slowdown, there's a noticeable preference among businesses for contingent workers, such as temporary, contract, or freelance staff. This trend is primarily driven by the need for operational flexibility and cost management in uncertain economic climates. Contingent labour allows organisations to adapt swiftly to fluctuating market demands without the financial and logistical commitments associated with permanent staffing. It also provides a channel for accessing specialized skills for project-specific needs.

Gradual Return to Permanent Hiring

As economic indicators stabilise and business confidence is restored, a gradual shift towards permanent hiring is observed. Companies begin to focus on long-term operational and growth strategies, necessitating the development of a stable and committed workforce. This shift, however, is gradual and contingent upon continued positive economic signals.

Sector-Specific Recovery Trends

Certain sectors, depending on the nature of the recession and subsequent recovery, may witness a faster return to permanent hiring. Industries less affected by the recession or those experiencing sustained demand, such as technology and healthcare, often lead to resuming permanent recruitment.

Contingent Workforce Demand in Times of Economic Uncertainty

Workforce Strategy Adaptations

Recessions typically lead to lasting changes in workforce management. Post-recession, businesses often adopt a more cautious and strategic approach to workforce planning, balancing contingent and permanent staff to optimise flexibility, cost, and skill availability.

Technological Influence on Skill Demand

Recessions can accelerate the pace of digital transformation and technological adoption, affecting skill demand in the recovery phase. Post-recession, there may be a heightened demand for specific technical skills, influencing both contingent and permanent hiring patterns. This shift is also reflective of a broader trend towards digitalization and automation across industries.

In conclusion, the recovery phase post-recession presents a complex interplay between contingent and permanent hiring. While initial trends favour contingent staffing for its flexibility and cost-effectiveness, a gradual shift towards permanent recruitment aligns with business stabilization and growth planning. This dynamic is further influenced by sector-specific demands, technological advancements, and strategic workforce planning adaptations.

Understanding these trends is crucial for businesses and workforce solutions providers to navigate the post-recession landscape effectively. Anticipating these trends could help shape a successful M&A strategy. Numerous studies have shown that companies that continue to pursue M&A during economic downturns tend to outperform their peers in the long term.
